OPEN TO PUBLIC yes St. Paul's Church, Berlin, is a one-story brick structure laid in common bond and painted white. It is three bays wide and four bays deep with a tall flat brick tower at the center of the gable serving as entrance-vestibule. The windows are all stain glass and of the gothic design, with two narrow windows surrounded by a quatrefoil. Those on the main facade are slightly taller and have a small circle instead of a quatrefoil. A molded band runs around the tower at the level of the [impost] of the semicircular arched entrance door which is Romanesque in feeling. Above the entrance are three very tall narrow windows, also having semicircular arches, as do all the openings of the tower. Above the aforesaid three windows is an open bellfry, slightly smaller than the rest of the tower and set off by several courses of stepped brick. There are two
